[Brand Name] — Brand Diagnostic

Summary line:

"[Brand Name] has built a product line with genuine differentiation in the Nigerian beauty market. The opportunity is to build a brand system and packaging experience that communicates that differentiation at first glance."

Page 2: What We Observed

Three to five specific observations. Each follows:

Observation: [What we noticed]

Where: [Packaging / Website / Instagram / Retail / Product range]

Why it matters: [Commercial implication]

Common observations for beauty brands:

1. Packaging does not communicate the price point.
The current label design and container choices are functional but do not signal premium. A customer comparing [Brand Name] to [competitor] on a shelf or in an Instagram flat-lay would not immediately recognize the quality difference from the packaging alone.
 2. Product range lacks visual cohesion.
Each product or line appears to have been designed separately. There is no unifying colour system, typography, or visual language that ties the range together as a single brand family.
 3. Website product pages undersell the product.
The photography is adequate but not styled at the level the product deserves. Product descriptions focus on features rather than the benefit narrative that drives purchase decisions in beauty.
 4. No brand story architecture.
The ingredient story, the founder story, and the brand mission are all strong but are not structured into a clear, consistent narrative across touchpoints. Each platform tells a slightly different version.
 5. Social content is volume-driven, not system-driven.
High posting frequency without a template system or content strategy. Individual posts are good, but the overall grid and story presence do not build a cohesive brand impression.

Page 3: The Opportunity

The opportunity is to build a brand and packaging system that matches the quality and intention behind [Brand Name]'s formulations. In beauty, the product experience begins before the customer opens the bottle. It begins with the packaging, the website, the social presence, and the unboxing. When these touchpoints consistently communicate quality, the perceived value rises, repeat purchase increases, and word-of-mouth becomes more powerful because customers feel proud to recommend and display the product.

Page 4: What This Could Look Like

Brand Strategy — Define the market positioning, competitive differentiation, and target audience with precision.

>

Identity System — Logo, typography, colour palette, and visual language that communicate the brand's quality tier.

>

Packaging System — Label design, container specification, secondary packaging (boxes, inserts), and unboxing experience design, built to scale across the full product range.

>

Digital Experience — Website redesign with product photography direction, conversion-focused product pages, and a brand story that connects.

>

Content System — Social media templates, campaign templates, and photography guidelines that maintain brand consistency without requiring a designer for every post.

Next step:

If this aligns with where you see [Brand Name] heading, we would like to walk through the full opportunity and discuss scope. A 30-minute call would be enough to determine whether there is a fit.

Writing Rules

1. Reference specific products, ingredients, or collections by name.
2. Compare packaging or presentation to specific competitors at the same or higher price point.
3. Never say "your packaging is bad." Say "the current packaging does not yet signal the quality level of the formulation."
4. Beauty founders are emotionally invested in their products. The diagnostic should feel respectful and commercially grounded.
5. Include at least one observation the prospect likely has not considered.
