Template A — Product-Brand Perception Gap

Subject (email): [Brand]'s product quality vs brand perception

Hi [Name],

I came across [Brand] and tried [specific product if possible, or reference reviews/reputation]. The product quality is clear.

What I noticed is that the packaging, website, and overall brand presentation do not yet do justice to what is actually inside the product. In the food and beverage space, customers make split-second decisions based on how a product looks before they ever taste it. When the packaging reads as mid-range but the product performs at a higher level, you lose customers who would have loved it.

We run Visiominds, a brand and design studio in Lagos. We have worked with product brands on closing this kind of gap. Would you be open to a quick conversation about what we noticed?

Template B — Shelf Competition

Subject (email): How [Brand] looks next to the competition

Hi [Name],

I was looking at the [category, e.g., juice/snack/sauce] space in Lagos and noticed [Brand]. The product stands out in quality, but on a shelf, whether physical or digital, the current packaging puts it in a visual category below where it belongs.

Competitors with weaker products are winning the first impression. That is a solvable problem.

We work with food and beverage brands on identity and packaging. Happy to share a few specific observations about [Brand]'s positioning if you are interested.

Template C — Scaling / New Distribution

Subject (email): [Brand]'s brand system for the next phase

Hi [Name],

Saw that [Brand] is expanding into [new retail outlets / online / new cities / new product lines]. Strong move.

In our experience, brands that built their identity early, sometimes on a small budget, hit a point where the packaging and visual system cannot carry the weight of the next stage. Retail buyers, distributors, and new customers in different markets all respond to brand presentation.

If you have been thinking about whether [Brand]'s identity is ready for this expansion, we would be glad to share what we have seen work for product brands at this stage.

Template D — Social-First, No System

Subject (email): Turning [Brand]'s social presence into a brand

Hi [Name],

[Brand]'s social content is strong. The food photography and customer engagement are clearly working.

What I notice is that there is not yet a cohesive brand system underneath it. The visual identity changes from post to post, the packaging does not carry the same energy as the social content, and a new customer visiting the profile or website would not immediately grasp the positioning.

We help food brands turn a social following into a brand system that works across every touchpoint. Interested in hearing a few specific thoughts?

Follow-Up Sequence

Follow-up 1 (4-5 days)

Hi [Name], following up briefly. I looked at [Brand]'s packaging relative to a few competitors in the same space. There is a clear opportunity to strengthen the shelf presence. Would you like me to share what I found?

Follow-up 2 (5-7 days later)

Hi [Name], one more note. We recently worked on a brand identity for a product company that had a similar challenge: great product, packaging that undersold it. The impact on customer perception was immediate. Here is a look: [case study link]. If this resonates, happy to talk.

Follow-up 3 (7-10 days later)

Hi [Name], last note. The observation about [Brand]'s [specific thing] still stands and I think it is a genuine opportunity. If timing is ever right, we are here.

Common Pain Points

1. Packaging undersells the product — the taste and quality are there, but the packaging looks generic.
2. No brand system — each product or variant looks like it came from a different company.
3. Shelf presence is weak — competitors with weaker products win the visual competition at retail.
4. Social-first without foundation — strong food photography but no cohesive visual identity.
5. Scaling problems — adding new products or entering new channels exposes gaps in the brand system.
6. Website is an afterthought — no ecommerce or a poorly designed one that does not match the product quality.

Tone Notes

Food and beverage founders are product-obsessed. They know their recipe, their sourcing, and their quality. The message should respect that expertise while pointing out the gap between product quality and brand presentation. Avoid condescending language about their current design. Frame everything as "the product deserves better."
