Structure

01 — Why We Are Reaching Out

[Brand Name] caught our attention because [specific reason: product quality, ingredient differentiation, growth trajectory, market position]. After our conversation on [date], it was clear that the brand is at a point where the visual identity and packaging need to evolve to support the company's growth into [new channels / new markets / expanded range].

02 — What We Observed

Detailed assessment of:

- Packaging — label design, container choice, material quality, information hierarchy, regulatory compliance, how it performs on shelf and in e-commerce photography
- Brand identity — logo, typography, colour, how the system performs across packaging, signage, social, print
- Range architecture — how well the visual system accommodates variants, sizes, limited editions, new product lines
- Website / ecommerce — product photography, descriptions, navigation, checkout, mobile experience
- Retail presentation — how the product appears in-store, on shelf, in display, in delivery
- Social and marketing — content quality, consistency, storytelling, campaign execution
- Competitive landscape — visual comparison to 3-5 competitors at the same or adjacent price points

03 — The Business Implication

In food and beverage, the purchase decision happens in seconds. At retail, the packaging must win attention, communicate quality, and justify the price point before the customer moves on. Online, the product photography and website experience must do the same job. When the packaging and brand presentation fall below the product quality, customer acquisition costs increase, retail partnerships become harder to secure, and the brand competes on price rather than perceived value.

04 — Our Hypothesis

[Brand Name]'s product has earned customer loyalty through quality. The brand system has not kept pace with the product. The opportunity is to build a packaging and identity system that matches the product quality, scales with the planned range expansion, and performs in both retail and digital contexts.

05 — What Visiominde Proposes

Phase 1 — Brand Strategy (2 weeks)

- Market positioning within the Nigerian F&B landscape
- Competitive visual audit
- Target audience profiling
- Brand architecture (product lines, variants, future SKUs)
