Template A — Brand System Gap

Subject (email): [Brand]'s creative output vs the brand itself

Hi [Name],

I have been following [Brand/Company] and the creative output is strong. The content, the events, the talent, the quality is there.

What I noticed is that [Brand] itself does not yet have a visual identity system that matches the level of its work. The logo, the social presence, the website, and the marketing materials all function but do not create the kind of brand impression that the creative output deserves. In entertainment and media, where perception is the product, that gap matters.

We run Visiominds, a brand and design studio in Lagos. We work with creative companies on building brand systems that match their ambition. Would you be open to a conversation about what we noticed?

Template B — Event / Show Branding

Subject (email): [Event/Show]'s visual identity

Hi [Name],

[Event/Show] clearly has a strong audience and a compelling concept. The programming and the energy are there.

What I noticed is that the visual branding, the social media templates, the promotional materials, and the event design, does not yet carry the same weight. For events, the brand is the preview. Potential attendees decide whether to buy a ticket based on how the event looks before they experience it.

We help entertainment brands build visual systems for their events and platforms. Interested in hearing a few thoughts?

Template C — Content Company / Media House

Subject (email): [Company]'s brand as a media business

Hi [Name],

[Company]'s content quality is evident. The production value, the storytelling, and the audience engagement all indicate a serious media operation.

As media businesses grow, the company brand itself, separate from any individual show or project, becomes important. It is what attracts talent, sponsors, advertisers, and partnerships. Right now, [Company]'s brand identity does not yet communicate the scale and professionalism of the operation behind the content.

We work with creative businesses on building corporate and project brand systems. Would you be interested in a short conversation?

Template D — Music / Artist Management

Subject (email): [Label/Artist/Management]'s brand infrastructure

Hi [Name],

The talent and the music speak for themselves. What I noticed is that the brand infrastructure around [Label/Artist], the visual identity, the website, the merch, the campaign materials, could be working harder.

In music and entertainment, the visual brand is inseparable from the creative identity. When the brand system is strong, every release, every tour, and every collaboration reinforces recognition and perceived value.

We build brand systems for creative companies. Happy to share a few observations if you are interested.

Follow-Up Sequence

Follow-up 1 (4-5 days)

Hi [Name], following up briefly. I looked at [Brand]'s visual presence relative to the creative output and there is a clear opportunity. Would you like me to share what I found?

Follow-up 2 (5-7 days later)

Hi [Name], we recently worked with a creative business on building a brand system that matched their output quality. The shift in how sponsors, partners, and audiences perceived them was immediate. If this resonates, happy to share.

Follow-up 3 (7-10 days later)

Hi [Name], last note. The creative work is strong. The brand infrastructure just needs to catch up. If timing is ever right, we are here.

Common Pain Points

1. Brand does not match creative quality — the output is premium but the company brand looks informal.
2. Event branding is ad hoc — each event gets one-off design with no system or brand continuity.
3. No company-level brand — individual projects or shows are well-known but the company behind them has no identity.
4. Merch and physical touchpoints are weak — merchandise, stage design, and promotional materials do not meet the creative standard.
5. Website is an afterthought — no proper digital home for the company or its projects.
6. Sponsor and partnership perception — the brand does not present at the level needed to attract premium sponsors.

Tone Notes

Entertainment and media founders are creative people. They respect taste, originality, and directness. The message should demonstrate that you understand their creative sensibility. Avoid corporate language. Be confident and culturally aware.
